teaching an enrichment course or proposing ideas for an enrichment program), Donna Falvo and Ned Brooks. We support of enrichment activities. Current members are Annette McLeod and Stephen Bernard.

The University's growing focus on virtual learning will likely affect future enrichment programming. The balance between on-campus, in-person learning and remote education is uncertain. Virtual options may be necessary to accommodate both students and faculty who prefer or require remote environments.

A recent survey conducted by the Office of the Registrar revealed that many students expressed a strong preference for in-person classes, especially for courses requiring hands-on lab work or group projects. The survey also indicated a significant interest in hybrid models that allow for flexibility in scheduling and attendance.

The survey data underscores the importance of adapting enrichment programs to meet diverse learning needs. The Friday Center should consider offering a variety of options, including fully online courses, blended learning experiences, and in-person workshops. Accessibility to technology and reliable internet connections are critical factors to consider in planning virtual programming.

Finally, the Friday Center should continue to seek input from the UNC community to ensure that enrichment activities align with the evolving needs and interests of students and faculty. Regular feedback mechanisms, such as surveys and focus groups, can help the center stay informed about trends and priorities.

In conclusion, the Friday Center should remain proactive in adapting to the changing landscape of higher education. By offering a mix of in-person and virtual enrichment opportunities, the center can continue to provide meaningful experiences for learners of all backgrounds.

If you wish to suggest an out of print book for possible donation, please email dfalvo@email.unc.edu. Donna Falvo, Distinguished Professor of English & Creative Writing at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, is available to share his time and knowledge with us.